Ministry opportunities:

Spare time and fulltime work in web evangelism

http://ied.gospelcom.net/vacancies.php

You want to be involved in some area of web evangelism? What next? First, two important statements:

- You do not need to be technical – there are many options available for everyone.
- Please take time to learn: we offer a range of training materials and books on our Training page. We all need equipping for any type of Christian ministry, and web evangelism is no exception.

Find/start your own

If you want to be involved in web evangelism on a sparetime basis at home, here are suggestions:

<tr>
<td>Chat room evangelism</td>
<td>Work at home as an individual. Or join a small team to cooperate and learn together</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Create a website</td>
<td>Consider the great potential of a Bridge Strategy site on a secular topic that interests you – for instance your hobby. Remember, there are huge needs for evangelistic sites in non-English languages. If you are not technical, you can build a site using a CMS template system</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Church website</td>
<td>Create or assist your church in production of an effective site</td>

<tr>
<td>Counseling/ mentoring</td>
<td>Offer support and advice to inquirers to an evangelistic or church website</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Other ministries</td>
<td>Be pro-active: find an online ministry with an agenda you identify with, and contact them directly. Many such sites are linked to in the Web Evangelism Guide and in the twice-monthly Bulletin email newsletter. Some members of the Internet Evangelism Coalition may also need volunteers.</td>

Opportunities available with different ministries

The following ministries can use unpaid sparetime volunteers. These opportunities are posted in good faith – we believe these ministries are, to the best of our knowledge, worthwhile in practice and orthodox in belief, but you must make your own judgement about them. Volunteers must expect to go through an application and vetting process; it is likely that an organization may wish to take up references about you with your church leaders.

A few of these ministries also offer fulltime ministry in online evangelism. Often, these will require applicants to raise their own support.

Send us your opportunities

We are happy to post other opportunities on this page. Please note: they must be directly related to online evangelism. Web-related opportunities in, for example, an evangelistic or mission agency, where the target audience is the ministry’s Christian support base, are outside our scope. To be added to this page, opportunities should primarily be outreach to non-Christians, or mentoring and discipling new Christians. Use the brief descriptive style displayed on this page.

You may find broader career opportunities at churchstaffing.com/lifeway and christiancareercenter.com. In UK, see Christian Jobs.

Making websites that are evangelistic

http://ied.gospelcom.net/outreach.php

Websites offer us incredible power to share the Good News. But to make use of this potential, we must understand these six issues:

1. The nature of the Internet
   It is a pull [www.web-evangelism.com/medium.php] medium. There is no automatic audience for any website. There are only three ways that someone will find a site:
   a. using a search engine
   b. following a link from another website
   c. by a personal recommendation – in an email, on a contact card, in print, TV/radio etc.

   The majority of website visits start through a search engine. Most other visits result from following recommended links on websites.

   Because people are in control of which pages they visit, in general they only find sites they are searching for – those which correspond to their particular interests and needs. Only rarely do people find sites by accident about topics which do not interest them, and even more rarely will they linger at them. (If you have no interest in chess, when did you last accidentally find a chess website?)

2. The Web is non-linear and interactive
   The outreach potential of the Web should not be seen primarily as ‘tracts online’. The Internet is a medium where people want choice, interaction, and a sense of community.

3. Most people are not seeking for God
   Although research shows that a surprising number of people do search the Web on broadly ‘religious’ topics, we must assume that these relate to all types of religions, including searches for horoscopes, fortune telling, and similar New Age issues.

   It is said that in any population at any one time, only about 2% of the people are knowingly seeking for God.
The Gray Matrix [www.web-evangelism.com/gray-matrix.php] is a valuable visual tool which helps us to understand the spiritual position of a person or group.

4. Most Christian websites are designed for Christians
The overwhelming majority of Christian websites are written purely for Christians, in terms of language and issues addressed. This can be called the 99 percent problem. [web-evangelism.com/99percent.php] The Body of Christ seems to spend most of its energies ministering to itself. Check the target audience of books and videos in any Christian bookshop, and do a count! Yes, of course we need feeding too – but to the end that we will have more to give than a ‘few crumbs under the table’.

5. Insider language excludes others
Many Christian websites, even those which hope to be evangelistic, tend to use Christian jargon. This may be incomprehensible to many non-Christians, and perceived as ‘church’ or ‘preachy’ by others. The result is that we tend to communicate well only to the ‘churched’ people (that is, those with some degree of church exposure in their lives), and fail to communicate with the much larger numbers of ‘unchurched’.

Jesus, by contrast, adjusted his language to his listeners, and most of his group evangelism took the form of stories in everyday language.

It is in fact possible – and highly preferable – to communicate the Gospel in easy neutral language. Arguably, the only religious words we need to use are ‘God’, ‘Jesus’, ‘Spirit’, ‘Bible’ and ‘heaven’. Everything else can be rephrased.

- Free training video clips – TruthMedia.com resource on effective evangelistic writing and followup

6. Wise web communication
Effective web communication needs the gifts of a journalist, not a preacher or evangelist. You do not have a captive audience. Site visitors can leave at the click of a mouse. The Press has learned over many years how to engage with and retain an audience. Learn their secrets!

Strategies
So what strategies can we use to reach non-Christians effectively on the Internet? First let’s look at two types of outreach site: ‘gospel presentations’ and ‘evangelistic sites’.

a. Gospel Presentations
   We define these as sites which focus mainly on the essentials of the Gospel. They may include some element of lead-in, but the primary focus is to explain the way of salvation. It is surprisingly hard to communicate the Gospel in a balanced biblical way, avoiding a cost-free ‘easy-believism’, while explaining the true nature of salvation by grace alone. IEC’s Now Try God [www.NowTryGod.com] is a ‘gospel presentation’, view others here.

   Gospel presentations can be easily found on search engines by people who are already seeking for the way of salvation. But in order to be read by a wider range of people, other strategies are needed. For instance, they are an ideal ‘find out more’ weblink for tracts, contact cards or radio/TV broadcasts.

   They can also serve as ready-made gospel links for Christian pages. For instance church or other Christian websites can link directly to an existing presentation, rather than creating their own. Even sites with a Christian target readership such as this one, can link (see our page footer) to an existing gospel presentation.

   available for any non-Christians who happen to visit. Because there are so many good gospel presentations available, it is not always necessary to ‘reinvent the wheel’.

b. Evangelistic sites
   These are distinguished from gospel presentations, by having content on a broader range of topics. They may well lead into a gospel presentation at their core, or they may link out to an existing presentation.

   The big need is for many more sites of this type. But how can we draw visitors in to reach them?

The Bridge Strategy

“Bait the hook according to what the fish likes, not what the fisherman likes.”
- Hemingway

Here’s the logic:

1. Most non-Christians are not seeking for God.
2. Most online non-Christians have no wish to search for Christian websites.
3. All online non-Christians are searching for websites on needs they have, and topics that interest them.
4. Therefore to reach non-Christians, we must create websites around the topics and felt needs that they have. This is the Bridge Strategy.

   It is “fishing on the other side of the boat”: John 21:5-6.
The Bridging Transition

A bridge site must be truly about the topic or need that is its starting point. There must be no sense of ‘bait and switch’ – this is not a ‘decoy trick’. But we can then transition across, with integrity, to:

- testimony pages – of the webmaster, or other people associated with the site topic. (But don't use the word ?testimony? – it is a jargon word. ?Life story? is much better.)
- parallel pages: almost all secular topics contain embedded within them a spiritual parallel which can be drawn out.
- ‘meaning of life’ questions: pages which ask leading questions
- a gospel presentation; the three previous categories of page can gently lead to an explanation of the way of salvation (within the site, or as an off-site link).

We are convinced that this Bridge Strategy [web-evangelism.com/bridge-strategy.php] is thoroughly justified biblically, and is a key to effective online outreach. For the first time, the Web allows us to target any affinity group of people with a high degree of precision, according to their interest, hobby, personal need, ethnic background or language.

What can we write Bridge pages about?

Anything! If you have a hobby or sport, you share that interest with millions of others. If you have come through a difficult personal problem or illness, you can be sure that is a felt need for millions of others. Do you have a professional interest? This is a wide-open field. The potential is mind-blowing.

Showcase examples of Bridge sites

You will see that different sites use the ‘bridge principle’ in different ways. Some sites address personal interests or hobbies. Others are designed to meet people’s felt needs.

- Women Today Magazine [www.womentodatymagazine.com] is a large and very effective site, which addresses women’s needs and issues. Because it is outwardly similar in appearance to a website which targets Christian women, it makes an excellent case study [web-evangelism.com/case-study.php] on how to target and write for non-Christians.
• I am Next [www.iamnext.com] uses a similar magazine approach for the teen/student band. Note that the site does not appear blatantly Christian from the home page, though there are links indicating some spiritual content.

• EveryStudent.com [www.everystudent.com] has a higher immediate spiritual profile than IamNext, with more apologetic material and answers to religious questions. Kristi and Patricia became Christians through this site: their stories.

• Hobbit Lore [www.hobbitlore.com] is for Tolkien enthusiasts. The world is divided into those who don’t ‘get’ Middle-Earth, and those who do! This site targets, very effectively, those who do.

• The Life [www.thelife.com] is one of several outreach sites which were developed in response to The Passion of the Christ film. It has been repositioned to take account of the tsunami tragedy. Cristina is one of many whose lives were touched through this site: her story.

• Sport is a valuable starting point for an outreach site. To the Next Level [www.tothenextlevel.org] developed by Doug Reese, is one of a small number of sport-related sites which specifically target non-Christians, view other examples. [web-evangelism.com/sport-pages.php]

• Health is one of the most-searched for topics on the Internet. There is a wide range of informational/diagnostic material online, and many support groups. Christians who suffer from a medical condition are well-placed to create a support site which can touch other sufferers. Unfortunately, a majority of such Christian sites position themselves as being for Christians suffering from the condition. This rather excludes non-Christians, and compromises any gentle evangelistic intent the writer may have had.

Examples of health sites which are accessible to non-Christians: here [web-evangelism.com/health.php]
• Relationships are another area of felt need [web-evangelism.com/felt-needs.php]
There is enormous potential within this subject. Outreach sites such as Women Today Magazine [www.womentodaymagazine.com] and MOPS [www.mops.org] frequently address relationship issues. A few other sites also cover them in a style designed, or least accessible, to non-Christians: examples. [web-evangelism.com/romance.php]

• Apologetics sites (i.e. reasoned answers to questions about faith) are usually written almost entirely for Christians. But sites which understand how to present these answers from an angle and in language that relates to non-Christians, can be very effective: examples. [web-evangelism.com/apologetics.php]

• Hobbies offer huge potential for outreach. A hobby-based site has the potential to reach millions of like-minded people around the world. If you have a hobby – you are well-equipped to write about what you know! Another strategy which is grossly underused: examples. [web-evangelism.com/hobbies.php]

• Community-based resource sites also have great potential. You can create a small portal for your town or area which draws together the best relevant local secular sites, but also includes outreach sites in appropriate categories: examples. [web-evangelism.com/community.php]

Other approaches and strategies
Outreach sites can complement other media, such as radio or print literature, and can also be specifically designed to draw people into face-to-face relationships. (Church websites are a prime example of this 'twin track' approach.) More on this topic. [web-evangelism.com/twintrack.php]
The popular ‘blog’ style of website can be used with many of these secular topics. There is another advantage here: it is possible to use a blog provider and create a very professional-looking site with very little technical knowledge.

God is leading some Christians into very creative and unusual ways to grab attention for the Gospel: examples. [web-evangelism.com/creative.php]
